Abstract: Nowadays, at the beginning of the 3rd millennium, there is no longer debate concerning the dependence of those in need of financial resources to the ones holding them. The highest cost of crises can be felt in countries which either take less effort in ensuring people's welfare or the measures taken in this respect are unsatisfactory – hence the frightening specter of poverty. This phenomenon is actually intertwined with that of subculture, which is created exactly by the mentioned type of economy, as it balances the state of pauperism and in adaptation of people lacking in almost any kind of resources, at their marginal (subsistence) position in society. We live times when the force of national authority seems more and more affected by the world expansion of capitalism (which tries to impose super-national rules). How will the national state keep up to such circumstances?

Keywords: economic crises, monetary-financial crises, perverse effects of crises
