Abstract: The State remains the guarantor of security and public welfare “the return to the state” having lately become a current theme of a desirable reality. If for the citizen having the state operate as a “safety net” is an important desired fact that comes without saying, lately organizations such as MNC and other international economic financial institutions have come to embrace the idea, desiring competent and efficacious states. National security is undoubtedly highly motivated by the forces of globalization – some have negative effects and generate conflicting states among states, triggering fragmentation and fear of cultural homogeneity, economic inequalities and inequities that seem unstoppable, but others do for sure have positive effects that stimulate cooperation among states. This duality of globalization effects can determine the state to become invigorated in the sense that it could turn back to its own national security
