Abstract: In the intense hustle of modern society, time has become a landmark that guides the existence of the individual and in the same time, the organizations' mechanisms. Taking in account these statements, it is imperative to identify the means through which temporality has an impact over the individual and on the organizations' management system. The synchronization of the rhythms, their coordination, becomes for modern man and for modern society an essential issue, and lack of time paradigm is becoming increasingly spread. Organizational time is often disliked because it violates traditional time, and the extreme devotement towards achieving the objectives of an organization can break the elements of time dedicated to families, friendships or even personal time. The fine tuning between the time people dedicate to an organization and their own time, which in most cases gives value to individual existence, is in terms of a turbulent environment, hard to achieve. From another perspective, the organization creates various management mechanisms which pushes the individual even further and takes away from him more of his personal and interactive time. Based on these premises, we try to tackle a highly sensitive subject, by identifying some of the problems posed by these temporal reports and the balance between individual plan, social and organizational, from the perspective of organization management.
